Space weather is the time-varying behavior of the space environment that influences the space environment itself and its consequences for human and robotic exploration of the solar system. While space weather poses important threats to space operations, its impact can be mitigated by careful planning and a healthy observatory network. Human-engineered observatories have made major advances in improving the ability to predict space weather, but the space-based infrastructure used to monitor and predict space weather is limited. Real-time observations from Earth-based observatories can complement space-based observations, thereby improving situational awareness. The significance and relative risk for missions in the solar system and beyond are evaluated by measuring and modeling the solar wind composition and time-dependent stability of the magnetosphere. We develop a new approach using U.S. Earth-based measurements to predict the behavior of the solar wind and the magnetosphere in time. The goal of the work presented here is to evaluate the significance of Earth-based measurements for the prediction of space weather. We develop a three-dimensional model of the geospace that includes both naturally occurring and human-engineered changes to the magnetic fields. We then apply this model to simulated variations of the solar wind through space to assess the significance of Earth-based human-engineered observations for the prediction of space weather. We find that at least 50% of a sample of significant
