For example, the concept of an "Absolute Winner" in chess is not a real thing, and is a logical construct. Is there a similar word, or terminology, for using an abstract concept or idea, in this case (in chess) a notional "win condition"? A: As noted in the comments, with "winning condition" you're referring to a sort of winning condition (which is commonly referred to as the game state). However, there is another way of describing winning conditions that might be of interest to you. Winning conditions are often called the "format" of the game, and this is because they vary from game to game (and also to some extent within the same game, depending on the rules). One of the simplest forms of winning condition is "the king is in checkmate". As you note, however, this is not an absolute and it would typically be expressed as "if the king were in checkmate". Another, more complex form of winning condition might be "a series of specific moves leading to checkmate", which is a bit easier to imagine (unless the player is "lucky" and makes a mistake). For more on this, see Wikipedia's article on checkmate. Another more complex form of winning condition is one that can be easily defined by human players: "in X minutes we're calling checkmate", or something of that sort. The main word to look for here is objective, which means "existing as a 6d1f23a050
