What's new:

The word 'quality' has been synonymous with the performance of the pigments. Extending the pigment life should be our prime concern. Our goal is to produce pigments that have the longest residence time in the trading market due to their pure properties that are gradually diminished if the pigment is not kept dry and 'safely' stored. All pigments are prepared in a confined certified environment to ensure quality control, which are tested on wet, dry and intermediary stages. Some of our formulations are customised and have higher pigment loading and purification requirements in order to gain consistency. Most of the pigments that are majorly sold in the market can be found in the list below: Mineral pigments Many of our mineral pigments are made from raw materials sourced from Poland which give intense blue colours. Other sources include Montana in the USA, Canada, Morocco, Russia, India, Brazil, Indonesia and Chile. Although it is true that mineral pigments are often times classified as non-toxic, its usage has some concerns. For instance, the pigments may occur in a number of sources and the extraction and processing of those sources may require hazardous chemicals and a lot of energy. Environmental impact Acid rain is an environmental problem because it leads to the dissolution of oxides into the water system. These oxides, like iron and zinc oxide, may turn into soluble substances which can partially neutralise the alkalinity in the water causing dissolution of limestone rocks that form the banks and natural springs. As is known, air pollution is a significant environmental problem in the world. Some of the most common pigments produce a harmful exhaust from their burning process. For example, iron oxides and zinc oxides generate bad gases called oxides of nitrogen and sulfurous, respectively. The pigments have some environmental aspects to consider not only when they are produced but also when they are diluted and used in water solutions. After all, they can be extracted from the environment in large quantities. Mineral pigments can undergo a number of processes, such as firing, milling, crushing, and sintering, each leading to a different degree of chemical instability of the materials and their residues. When pigments are dry-milled and calcined, the growth of defects is very high. The presence of such defects can accelerate the oxidation process of pigment particles. The use of atmospheric oxygen in the kiln to sinter the pigments
