The mammalian gastrointestinal (GI) tract is populated by complex and diverse microbiota which have both beneficial and harmful effects on intestinal homeostasis. The commensal microbiota provides a diverse source of nutrients for the host to consume. This relationship is thought to be a defensive one where the host is able to control the bacterial colonisation of their tract by means of immunity. Immune surveillance is known to be active in the gut mucosa including the GALT (gut associated lymphoid tissue). Immunity in the gut is thought to be developed during early life in a naïve model of immune protection. This relationship is thought to be a defensive one where the host is able to control the bacterial colonisation of their tract by means of immunity. Investigations in our laboratory during the last five years have highlighted the importance of the oral cavity in the development of mucosal immunity in the gut. Mice born orally supplemented with lactobacilli show less intestinal inflammation upon immunisation with Salmonella typhimurium (ST) compared to mice born by the intra-vaginal (IV) route, via milk from the mother. Furthermore, the majority of lactobacilli found in the oral cavities of these mice are derived from the mother, indicating that bacteria from the vagina are not able to transit into the mouth. However, mice born orally supplemented with lactobacilli show less intestinal inflammation upon immunisation with ST compared to mice born by the intra-vaginal (IV) route, via milk from the mother. Furthermore, the majority of lactobacilli found in the oral cavities of these mice are derived from the mother, indicating that bacteria from the vagina are not able to transit into the mouth. These results support the novel concept of maternally derived lactobacilli suppressing gut inflammation in the offspring, being specific to intestinal inflammation. The goal of this proposal is to investigate the relationship between oral commensal bacteria and immune development in the gut using the ST-induced colitis model. We hypothesise that if lactobacilli are present in the oral cavity via maternal milk at the time of immunisation (an early life oral exposure) it will mediate tolerance in the offspring, preventing the development of an inflammatory response, yet inflammation will develop in the offspring if lactobacilli are absent. Therefore, in this
