Drop off at Thierry Pavement and me and Lady Metcalf will have a little fun discovering all that the ever changing Metcalf family have created. We may even find some worthwhile bits of history hidden in the cobbled streets (or in them!). Thierry Pavement is a little to the north of Place de Neuilly, so only a short walk from the metro station - and, on a fine Sunday morning, Montmartre is a pleasing place to be. Many a Parisian family picnic has been made here, taking advantage of the Metcalfs' love of pastry and fakery. All you need to know is that Thierry Pavement isn't a place of brioche and baguettes (though you will find many such in the surrounding area) but rather home to a wonderfully winding street where some of Paris's oldest and most distinctive buildings can be found. Where the road narrows (which isn't far into the neighbourhood, mind you) the houses seem to compete with their neighbours to be the most gorgeous, their doors and windows stunningly painted. One of the houses, an early 19th century town house with tiny windows and enormous stone steps, is the property of Montmartre wine importer Daniel Lett

How To Crack:
