The enhanced engine includes an Adrenalin Rush gameplay mechanic that uses the tools available in the game to provide opponents with a unique set of physical challenges. "If you've seen FIFA 19, you'll know that we've focused on delivering an experience where the ball will behave in a lifelike way, with every player's movement and every interaction with the ball being a point of emphasis to create a truly authentic experience. The introduction of HyperMotion Technology builds on this foundation by using player's real-life movements to bring the ball to life," FIFA Lead Gameplay Designer Stefan Sauerzapf told ESPN FC. "This can be seen, for example, when tackling, when players get out of their position, when players are facing the ball, or when making a last-ditch run at goal. Add to this the more authentic animations created for dribbling, ball handling and shooting, and it's an overall more immersive gameplay experience." HyperMotion Technology focuses on improving the AI of the ball to make it behave as realistically as possible. This includes ball acceleration and movement, as well as how the ball is affected by the player's feet. AI also plays an important role in the shape and size of the ball, the position and pressure of the player's feet, and how the player uses the ball to take advantage of his/her teammates. "In FIFA 19, the ball could pass through people at speeds and angles that we wouldn't normally see," Sauerzapf said. "And in the game engine, there are rules regarding how the ball behaves - but we've now taken it a step further and are introducing the ability for players to alter the rules through the new 'impose' mechanic that makes it easy for players to change the physical properties of the ball using interactive techniques. For example, by manipulating the player's feet and legs in the player's favoured way, we can use the interactive tools to alter the height of the ball." "The availability of this new technology in FIFA 22 enables us to create a football game with a wider world, more authentic ball physics and on-pitch reactions," he added. "Players have the power to create the game of football they want to see." AI also makes players faster and stronger, while physical player attributes also impact on-field interactions. For example, pace and acceleration are enhanced for fast players like forwards or center
