Flagellar rotation and the number of flagellar motors per cell are tightly coupled, with decreasing number of flagella and increasing motor number resulting in decreased rotation frequency. The mutation thiC7 increases the number of motility-related proteins per cell. ThiC7 imparts motility to a Salmonella strain, but the flagellum rotates at a high frequency and is only weakly motile. This suggests that regulatory mechanisms that couple motor number to rotation frequency may be different in Salmonella and in E. coli. Regulation of flagellar motor number is best understood in E. coli. Despite the different regulatory systems, a pathway of regulation similar to that of E. coli is found in Salmonella. Protein components important in Salmonella appear to act in the pathway of regulation in E. coli. This duality of pathways and their similarity suggests that there are fewer mechanistic regulatory points between the two bacteria, and that the two bacteria share more evolutionary common ground than previously appreciated. is the highest common divisor of q and 51? 51 Let $k(u) = u^3 - 21u^2 + 23u + 44$.
