GoÃn were the expert besiegers, and Goaikuru the expert defenders.Q: System.Reflection.TargetInvocationException in WebApi Method Using the following API code: public string Test(string str) { var x = str; return x; } If I change the str parameter to an array I get an exception in the getter, which is "System.Reflection.TargetInvocationException" This code does work fine: public string Test(string[] str) { var x = str[0]; return x; } Why is this? The parameter is not identical so I thought it should be fine. Is there a way to solve this without checking each item in the array? A: You are not actually assigning the values to the parameter. Change it to: var x = str[0]; str = x; return x; That will work for any of the array-like types. Just remember that this causes undefined behavior if the array member is empty, or if the array is null, etc. A: You have to set the value in the array. That error is due to your design. Alternatively, you can change the parameter type to string[] as hinted by Ankit Gupta. Thursday, June 1, 2010 More Knicks offseason updates Brandon Jennings was cut from the Lakers' summer league team, a move that was expected given the Lakers' cap situation and the lack of help that Jennings will receive from Brandon Roy. The Knicks are expected to have a job offer for Rasheed Wallace within the next 24 hours.
