The postnatal development of the peripheral nervous system in the mouse: a comparative study using axon density and myelin basic protein immunocytochemistry. The postnatal development of axon density and myelin basic protein (MBP) content of sciatic nerve was studied in the mouse to compare the sequence of these events with corresponding events in the rat and in human. The effect of experimental crush of the distal tibial nerve was also studied. In the mouse, the process of myelination in the peripheral nerves is completed by the end of the second week after birth, with only small differences between axon density and MBP content of fibers of different diameters. Sciatic nerve function was slightly impaired in the first postnatal week in the mouse compared with the rat, but by the end of the second week the function of the mouse nerves was normal. No impairment of function was observed in the mouse following a crush of the tibial nerve on the same day as the birth of the pups. Therefore, although maturation of the mouse peripheral nerve may be slightly delayed as compared with the rat, the timing of the process is coincident with that described in other species. The sequence of myelination in the mouse resembles that in the rat, which is in contrast to humans.
