Ajury found Const. Cindy Streveler not guilty on two counts of sexual assault and one count of unsafe keeping of a firearm. On Thursday, after deliberating for three days, the jury found Streveler not guilty of a third count of unsafe keeping of a firearm. The Crown's case against Streveler hinged on text messages she sent to the complainant during what was supposed to be a romantic relationship in the summer of 2010. The complainant testified that her mother broke up with Streveler's father, and the officer tried to get her into a sexual relationship during the summer. The Crown said Streveler was texting back and forth with the girl while she was underage and had a genuine interest in her. The defence has said the texts were a series of flirtations between two people who were dating, and not sexual in nature. After the verdict, Streveler told reporters outside court she was disappointed in the verdict. She said she had faith in the jury and maintained the relationship was consensual. "I'm relieved and thankful to God that [the complainant's] family and I will be able to move on with our lives and continue to have each other's backs," Streveler said. "This was a dark time for all of us, I think everybody in court knew the end result, but at least we can move on." On Thursday, Streveler's lawyer said she is not pleased with the verdict. "She had no idea her behaviour would be viewed in such a light," said Andy Cornfield. Cornfield said he is seeking a directed verdict on all charges. Streveler is due to make a statement in court next week. British Prime Minister Theresa May speaks in Parliament, Wednesday, Dec. 5, 2018 in London. British lawmakers are beginning debate on a deal with the European Union that would end a long-running divorce, but there are signs the plan has suffered one of its biggest
