A chilling description of a capture-and-hold weapons team hit the internet last week. A former sniper with the Canadian military “exposed” the tactics employed by Special Ops soldiers during training exercises, painting a picture of a much more sinister version of training for which the soldier is not adequately prepared. The video — titled “Last Man Standing” — was posted to YouTube by “justgilding” on November 16, two days before the release of a U.S. Army study about the problems soldiers are encountering in training for capture and kill missions. The video was originally posted in 2014, and has not been removed or obscured. It shows a Special Forces soldier — whose actions in the clip are later corroborated by the Army’s report — walking through a building, searching for someone on the second floor and then catching them. “There’s no concern of collateral damage. There’s no concern about killing civilians. There’s no concern about the physical and mental stress that’s placed on the soldier,” the narrator says, in a moment of seeming unguarded emotion. “Because I served with one. Because my friends were destroyed. Because they’re not there anymore.” In the report being published today, the

Army found that its force of remote-controlled drones flying off the front lines is woefully unprepared for the mission it is expected to undertake. Titled “Mature Incremental Training,” the report suggests a host of needed changes to the Army’s training program to protect soldiers, too, in the event of a future situation. “Mature Incremental” training is a practice in which soldiers are put through several months of training exercises before being ordered into a real battle. The newer types of soldiers are often sent into battle without having undergone a “green-on-green” training exercise, to prepare them for what they’re going to see. The Army has been running what it calls “green-on-green” exercises in which trainees are put through mock missions with drones — armed with lethal weapons — on the battlefield. “This is the first time that since the end of the War on Terror that we have in place a plan to train our force for the day after we stop.” The clip, therefore, provides a window into a training that is

With this week’s release of this inane documentary on The Muppets—being touted by ABC as “the most faithful movie adaptation of a television series ever made” —I’ve been reflecting on why it took so long for Hollywood to catch on to the undeniable zeitgeist that has been created by the Muppets. Considering the fact that television is currently one of the biggest drivers of the modern economy, and that the first broadcast of The Muppet Show occurred almost thirty years ago, it's remarkable that it took this long for Hollywood to recognize the latent box office power that Jim Henson

and crew had created.

According to an article in the Huffington Post, the Muppets grossed $3.7 billion in 2010, making them the 15th highest-grossing film franchise that year. (The top franchise that year was Harry Potter at $5.9 billion, with The Hunger Games at $3.6 billion coming in second.) Though the report doesn't mention the 2010 reboot, I can only assume that it likely contributed significantly to the estimated

$4 billion global revenues realized by The Muppets, which has grossed over $1 billion at the domestic box office in each of the past two weeks, according to Box Office Mojo. Because of their successful film adaptation, the Muppets have also become associated with the popular “Muppets” app for mobile devices, and have spawned a host of Muppet-themed magazines and collectibles like Mike and Ike (of the Ike and Tina Turner variety, not the Ike and Gabby variety) and the Muppet Art of Jim Henson. It's certainly not a bad thing for the Muppets to find fame on the silver screen. However, it's the fact that the Muppets have become successful while staying true to the original concept of Jim Henson that has made them so intriguing to a generation of children. Video History Though it's common knowledge today that The Muppet Show started out as a rejected pilot, a few facts about the show's genesis are not as widely known. The Muppet Show premiered on October 18, 1975, on ABC and was the brainchild of puppeteer Jim Henson, who also helmed The Jim Henson Hour. According to a 1977 article in Newsweek, Henson was asked to create a children's show for ABC because they
