It was the coldest day of the year, like many others in this part of New England, and as Emily dragged a snow blower behind her and bundled up in layers, she spotted Randy on the porch of their friends, talking animatedly on his cell phone. He noticed her for the first time and as he turned to see who she was, her mouth dropped open in horror as she watched him drop his phone onto the porch. "I don't believe it! You?!" "Don't worry about it!" he said, reaching down to catch his phone as it slid through the snow, "I was talking to my mom so I know she wants us to meet, and I want to meet you too, so if you want, let's do it this weekend." "This weekend?!" "Yeah! I have a better idea than that. Let's go to my house."

Spanish dialect in Houston The spoken Spanish dialect of Houston (Tex-Mex) is mostly unrelated to the Mexican Spanish. It is very similar to that of the Mexican immigrants in the city, although there are subtle differences in the pronunciation. An occasional Mexican villager has been known to pick up the city accent. Mexican Spanish and Tex-Mex are two different languages and do not use the same Latin roots. Variants The two variants, Mexican Spanish and Tex-Mex, differ primarily in the use of the letter "H". As a general rule, Mexican Spanish tends to use the "H" vowel while Tex-Mex tends to not use the "H". As a result, the "H" sound becomes a voiceless "g" in both cases. This usually happens in inanimate objects such as house, shoe, or car. Both Mexican Spanish and Tex-Mex make the "I" vowel sound more distinct from the "E" vowel. For example, the "H" is more closed (closed before "V" and "H" are pronounced as "H", as in "México" but the "E" in "hecho" has a more open sound. (Compare a more closed "G" in "Inglés" with a more open "G" in "Gringo", or a more closed "H" in "Dependencia" with a more open "H" in "casa"). This makes the "I" sound more distinct from the "E". In addition to the differences between Mexican Spanish and Tex-Mex, there is a difference in the accent between the native English speakers of Houston and the immigrants. Immigration events such as the 1991 Gulf War had an effect on the accent of the words and phrases. Communication Traditionally, Spanish-speaking people in Houston speak in a mixture of Spanish and English. Many Spanish speaking people use both Spanish and English in their conversations.
