It is certain that China will enjoy a high economic growth rate for the next few years. The transition of economy from heavy energy-intensive to low-carbon has put a big challenge to Chinese building sector. So far, most Chinese construction industry is dominated by conventionally-built buildings, which account for 60% of GDP. With the emerging target of 70% in 2030, energy efficiency has been accepted as one of the key structural drivers for sectoral sustainable development. And yet, one of the biggest challenges to the sustainable development of China's building sector is its energy intensity. In 2014, China's total domestic energy consumption amounted to 13.5 million tons of coal equivalent, and 9.5 million tons of natural gas equivalent. The energy intensity of building in China is estimated to be 13.4 tons of oil equivalent per square meter in 2015. In other words, China's current energy consumption to build a square meter of dwelling is three times higher than France and Germany. In the short term, China's building sector will face with a fierce competition for territorial space in major cities. According to the projections in China Building and Wood Industry Development Plan, China's urban population growth rate of non-community level is estimated to be about 3.4% per annum in the next 25 years. In addition, an increasing trend of growing urbanization would intensify the competition for building space among these cities. After decades of development, China's building industry has become a driver of social progress and an engine of national economic growth, accounting for an equivalent of 4% of GDP in 2010. The construction industry has become the fourth largest employment industry with an annual employment of 180 million people and its total investments of 40 trillion yuan. As a building sector that has accelerated the nation's economic growth, the construction industry has made enormous contributions to the achievement of the ecological goals of China's modernization. The building industry's high emission of SO2
