It happened: You open a folder from the File Manager, then as you go to select a single file, the directory opens. Why does this happen? If you've been using Windows Vista or Windows 7, you're in the company of a "feature" with a long name, and it's probably something to do with that. Maybe you've mistakenly hit the Windows key twice in the folder. Perhaps you've used Alt + Tab to switch from one window to another window that's in the foreground, and now Alt + Tab doesn't switch windows, but closes the folder in the foreground. (And forget it, you can't move the cursor to the side of the screen and press Tab to switch.) What is this feature called? The feature is called "folders can't be opened by themselves". It's about the most awesome feature ever to feature-test Windows (I wish Microsoft would get a feature like that right), and it appears to be a requirement of the latest major version of Windows Explorer. For some reason, IE8 doesn't show it. I downloaded the latest version of Explorer; I set it to work with the Vista (SP1) theme; I changed to the XP theme; I changed to Classic theme; even I tried to change to the default theme, but still I could not open a folder by itself. When I opened the folder from the file manager, it just wanted to open the folder's contents. When I wanted to choose a file, it looked for a new directory in which to place the file. It didn't open the folder that contained the file; it just opened the file (you already knew that!) Oh, it was there. It was there all the time, but I'd never noticed it. It always gave me the option of "opening in a new folder." As long as I knew where the file was, I didn't need to search for the file in the first place, and I could always figure out what file I wanted with no trouble at all. That feature was confusing
