Workers can use the app to keep in contact with the agency's nearest branch via voice and chat, and access the service's customer care portal. The app, which has been designed by a team at Linköping University's Business School, allows callers and providers to find out which call centre or service desk has the expertise to solve their query. The service's vast database of technicians means clients won't have to repeat themselves or wait for a call back. The team has already received feedback from its beta testers, some of whom are representatives of telecoms providers. According to Linköping University's press release, the service will be especially useful for workers in smaller organisations. The service's creators have decided to tackle the tech sector because they believe the wider potential of the app. Workers who use the service will be able to access information relating to a company's policies and procedures, and information about its service portfolio. That means workers can quickly identify the best solutions to problems they may encounter at their place of work. The service will be available in English, Swedish, Norwegian and Danish.
