Volcanic magma is usually rich in magnesite, so how does that affect its ability to melt the nearby rocks? A: Volcanic magma is not "magnesite" the difference is that volcanic magma is usually lighter than the main volcanic rocks in an eruption, which means it can rise much more rapidly. The lighter magma is only slightly more dense than the water and becomes the main phase in the lava, and the water is driven out of the magma and the density increases. If your question is "how does a volcano melt the rocks" then the lava comes in contact with more rock, and would tend to dissolve some of the rocks. 6d1f23a050
