We have separated and mounted tissues of the brain and spinal cord to display the tracer signal. We imported the raw data into Adobe Photoshop CC Frontiers in Systems . They were supposed to look like if you saw brain tissue under a microscope. They should have appeared transparent and, in most cases, fluorescent. This is the trace signal. We then generated the images using the print-and-die method and loaded them into Photoshop. In Photoshop, we created a new mask layer on top of all layers, and when we selected this layer, we could see what color Photoshop was using. This is the color red.
