An article that ran on Wall Street Journal Monday confirms a Bloomberg report last week that "Hulu is about to become an over-stored-car model." According to the report, which first broke back in April, Hulu will have a revenue shortfall of between $40 million and $100 million by the end of 2016. The article confirmed that this could be a result of higher than anticipated subscriber costs due to stiff competition with cable networks like ESPN, Viacom and Time Warner.

Climate change causes sea-level rise, but the elevation of the land surface (or land subsidence) is a more important driver of sea-level rise than is widespread loss of ice from Greenland, a new study has concluded. The study was led by Anjali Bamzai, a graduate student at the University of Utah's Center for Climate and Environmental Research in Salt Lake City. "The sea-level rise we're talking about is really a lot bigger than the documented sea-level rise by the end of the century," Bamzai said. "Sea-level rise is happening even much faster than expected." Bamzai and her team collaborated with the U.S. Geological Survey to incorporate newly available information on rates of precipitation and surface temperature change and the relationships between those two phenomena. They focused on precipitation because it has a greater direct effect on the water cycle than surface temperature change. Bamzai and her team found that while the world's largest river basins—the Amazon, the Nile and the Yangtze—are experiencing a convergence of precipitation and temperature changes that results in more and larger precipitation events, other regions are not. "The precipitation is coming down in the same places where it's warmer, and it's changing," Bamzai said. The study was published in the Journal of Applied Remote Sensing.
