A new study by the

---

American
Geophysical Union
found that fish are three times more likely to eat
sediments with mercury than
previously thought.
Like smelting
operations,

---

mercury poisoning
is common in some industries and
causes mercury-
containing waste to leach into the environment.
Incredibly, fish and
other marine
animals can also

---

carry mercury into the food chain. The impact of mercury
on the environment is hard to overestimate. It's the culprit behind
at least 20,000
premature deaths

---

each year,
according to the World Health Organization. And
while mercury
pollution is especially devastating to animals, it can even have serious

impacts on humans. Research indicates that mercury can cause brain damage in fetuses, miscarriages and low birth weight, and can lead to children suffering from learning disabilities, skin rashes, autism and other neurological disorders later in life. The study, co-led by Ian Gordon, senior author and professor emeritus at New York

---

University's Center
for Marine Conservation, and
Joan Quinn,
distinguished
professor at Johns Hopkins

University's Center
for Marine Studies, took a look at the

---

exposure of fish to mercury-laden
sediment.

Traditionally,
researchers have
found mercury
concentrations in
fish low enough
that they felt safe
letting fishermen

---

and consumers eat the fish. But a closer look at the fish reveals that it
can be a toxic,
dangerous stew of
toxins, including
lead, copper,
cadmium, arsenic,
chromium, and

---

manganese. Before the study was published, Gordon and Quinn already knew that fish are exposed to mercury indirectly. They have long observed that many fish species

---

travel upstream
and deposit their waste products
upstream, often along the banks. In turn, these waste
products can end
up in the water,
where they affect
the organisms

living there. In fact, the EPA is even
warning
fishmongers to pull their fish from the shelves because of mercury contamination. The agency's recent
rules are intended

---

to reduce mercury's impacts on our health by nearly 90 percent from the levels that existed before 1990. In some areas, fish used to be the only food available. But the

---

rise of aquaculture
and increased
fishing has led to these species
changing the make-up of their diets.
While the animals
are looking for food, they may be picking up

contaminants as a by-product of their feeding. “It has been assumed that the fish were not eating food containing mercury, as in the past few decades most fish were wild
